

About the authors

---

Eugene Campbell was professor of population studies at the University of Botswana and has previously lectured at Obafemi Awolowo University and the University of Liberia. He was co-ordinator of the Southern African Migration Project in Botswana and demographer in the United Nations Volunteer Programme in Botswana. He has been a consultant for several organisations, including the World Bank, United Nations and Commonwealth Secretariat, and has attracted research funds from numerous international organisations, including Rockefeller Foundation, Union for African Population Studies and DIFD. His major research areas are migration and development, and fertility (attitudes and behaviour). Dr Campbell was visiting fellow at the University of Warwick and he has published extensively in international journals and books.

John Connell is professor of human geography in the School of Geosciences, University of Sydney. Prior to the University of Sydney he was at the Institute of Development Studies, University of Sussex, and the Department of Economics, Research School of Pacific Studies, Australian National University. He has been a consultant for the International Labour Organization, the World Health Organization, the South Pacific Commission, SPREP, the World Bank and the Asian Development Bank. He has written more than 300 articles and over 20 books, including Islands at Risk?: Environments, Economies and Contemporary Change (2013, Edward Elgar Publishing Ltd), Papua New Guinea: The Struggle for Development (1997, Routledge) and Migration from Rural Areas: The Evidence from Village Studies (with Dasgupta, Laishley and Lipton, 1976, Oxford University Press).

Bernard Headley is professor emeritus of justice studies, Northeastern Illinois University, Chicago (USA) and retired professor of criminology, University of the West Indies, Mona. A twice awarded Senior Fulbright Scholar to Jamaica, his research interest is in the area of the intersection of migration and crime. His books include Deported: Entry and Exit Findings of Jamaicans Returned from the United States (2005, Stephenson Litho Press) and The Jamaican Crime Scene: A Perspective (1994, Eureka Press Ltd).

Kay Ann Henry is a psychology graduate student in the Department of Sociology, Psychology and Social Work, University of the West Indies, Mona, Jamaica.

Wonderful Hope Khonje is an acting economic advisor in the Climate Finance and Small States section of the Economic Policy Division at the Commonwealth Secretariat. Since 2009, Mr Khonje has worked and published in a number of areas related to the economic development of small states. Mr Khonje has a background in development at both country and international levels.

Claremont Kirton is professor of development economics in the Department of Economics at the University of the West Indies (UWI), Mona, Jamaica, where he teaches courses in economic development theory, economic development policy and banking and finance. He is a founding member of the Caribbean Diaspora Economy Research Group (CDERG). His research interests include development policy, regional economic integration, financial sector performance, micro and small-scale enterprises, and economics of the diaspora. He has authored and co-authored monographs and articles in academic journals as well as technical reports on a range of issues related to economic development.

Patsy Lewis is a professor at the Sir Arthur Lewis Institute for Social and Economic Studies (SALISES), UWI, Mona, Jamaica. Her research focuses on the development challenges of small states. She has published on the regional integration processes of small Caribbean states, specifically the Organisation of Eastern Caribbean States (OECs) and the Caribbean Community (CARICOM), challenges of migration, trade, and on the Grenada invasion as well as its social policy. She is currently engaged with colleagues on the research project 'Navigating Crises in a Small State: A Grenada Case Study', which examines the role of community organisations in periods of crisis in Grenada.

Jon Sward is a doctoral candidate in migration studies at the University of Sussex, United Kingdom. His thesis investigates the livelihoods of internal migrant farmers in Brong Ahafo, Ghana, with a focus on land tenure and environmental change as key mediating factors. He has undertaken a range of consultancy projects on migration, development and climate change issues commissioned by the United Nations Development Programme, the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, the Commonwealth Secretariat, Foresight, the European Commission and the World Bank.

Daniel Tevera is professor and head of the Department of Geography and Environmental Studies at the University of the Western Cape, Cape Town, South Africa. His research addresses a broad spectrum of socio-spatial issues, including urban governance and service delivery; state-led regional development initiatives; brain drain; xenophobia; and provision of low-cost urban housing. Professor Tevera has over 90 scholarly publications to his credit. His co-edited books include: Zimbabwe's Exodus: Crisis, Migration and Survival (2010, Southern African Migration Programme and International Development Research Centre); Socio-Economic Development and the Environment in Swaziland (2010, University of Swaziland); and Harare: The Growth and Problems of the City, (1993, University of Zimbabwe Publications).